News from Sonora states that Cojeme, ernment. Cajeme's nerve is to be commended, however his good judgment may be open to criticism. It is hoped by every one who knows the peaceful inclination of this industrious and friendly remnant of a once great and powerful race of people, that the Mexican government will accord to them unusual consideration in the settlement of the present difficulty. The Indians are mentally and physically fine specimens of manhood, and they are in no sense warlike. They are a desirable class of toilers and carry on commercial relations with many seaports along the Gulf of California, and their men find employment as miners and farmers and herders throughout the State of Sonora. With a guarantee of immunity from disturbance, and the introduction of an educational system among them, the Yaquis and Mayos will become in time citizens whom the Mexican government will regard with singular pride, for they are a capable race. When the president announced his determination to adhere strictly to the civil service laws, the knowing ones of the democratic party winked significantly at each other and pronounced a reverential amen. They felt sure that it was only a gilt-edged profession, certain to tarnish by the corroding influences of time with their assistance, and it was such an attractive and pretty banner to sail under. With a plausible show of consistency the civil services light was made to shine before men for a short period of time while the spoils leaven was working beneath the surface, and ere the dazzled public became aware of the true condition of affairs its phosphorescent glow had dimmed and the invisible axe was swung right and left. The honorable senate, however, refused to become a party to the success of the hypocritical process, and it has found a difficult task in its efforts to preserve the honor of the president whose isotropic veracity was in danger of parting under the extreme tension by the tugging of the hungry mob, and they have exposed his inconsistencies. He has zealously striven to accomplish the very difficult feat of combining two antagonistic systems, with the usual result, and he has therefore lost the respect and confidence of both political factions. The civil service commission, intended to be a non-partisan board of examiners, has been so thoroughly disgusted with the perversion of duty required of them that they have severally resigned, and their places have been filled to create a democratic majority. But the spoils advocates, like Haman of old when he saw the hated Mordecar at the king's gate, are sorrowful that even one republican sits with the commission, and they would like nothing better than to choke him with a political gag. Congressman Bennett, of North Carolina, voiced the sentiment of the democratic party in a recent speech, when he said: "Are not lifted up their voices in one grand cho- known, Arizona has never been visited rus and pointed to the standard-bearer by these afflicting furies, unless the cratic victory and that the legitimate visitation. with the significance of the game."
